What Might Have Been Done.

When the revelations as to the terrible tax situation in this town were published last winter, the people were astounded and indignant, as they had the right to be. Those charged with the management of these affairs at first attempted a defense of their action, insisting upon the retention of the tax arrearage clerks who had not been sufficiently diligent to collect their own back taxes. Then when the overwhelming weight and force of public opinion was too strong to resist they took another tack. Then they claimed, with a vigorous display of alleged civic virtue, that they had instituted the investigations and ought to have all the credit for what the bankers' committee, the experts and Treasurer Bannigan accomplished. Of course that deceived nobody in particular, but feeling obliged to say something, that was the first argument they seized upon as available. The report to the Common Council, dated February 17, and transmitted to the council March 3, by the experts, pointed out the amounts the city had expended in purchasing property at tax sales, said the city had lost considerable amounts by neglect to exercise the rights it had, some of which rights have lapsed, that the city had never received any rentals from the properties purchased and that there was no record that "any effort has been made to take possession of properties bought at tax sale under powers conferred by the charter."

In that same report transmitted to the council on the 3d of March, read there and published in the papers next day, the experts recommend that action be taken so that the city may collect the $44,703.83 which is its due or obtain valuable security for the same. Another report was made to the council by the experts July [illegible], again recommending that the city take some action for the collection of these amounts. At that meeting, on motion of Ald. Metzger of the finance committee, the report was accepted and the citizens' committee discharged. At the same meeting Ald. Reagan, member of the [illegible] committee, offered a resolution directing the employment of the experts to oversee the closing of the books, another favoring an annual audit of the treasurer's books, and a third directing the corporation counsel to prepare for introduction into the Legislature—which does not meet till next January—amendments to the charter providing for a comptroller, etc., but neglected to do the really important thing—directing the Common Council to proceed to acquire for the city the rights to which it is entitled, the rights for which it had paid more than $40,000, and for which as yet it has received no return.

Was that shielding the tax dodgers or was it proceeding vigorously against them? Would the director of a business corporation have neglected to take steps to recover over $40,000 the company's due, where the procedure is perfectly plain and collection certain to follow that procedure? The corporation counsel acts under orders of the Common Council and had he been directed to recover this money presumably would have done it by this time and the city would have been accordingly enriched. The members of the finance committee and the whole council had had this matter twice called to their attention by the experts. Ald. Reagan's resolutions were all right as far as they went, but the most important one calculated to recover the more than $40,000 the city had paid out, was not then and never has since been introduced. Those are the facts. The people are quite competent to draw their own conclusions.

The End of Russian Absolutism.

At last, after seemingly hopeless striving, the Russian people have wrung something real from a reluctant and apparently impregnable autocracy. In brief the czar has granted them the foundations of civil and religious liberty, a parliament with real power and has promised that such parliament shall be chosen practically by universal suffrage. If the terms of this manifesto, as they appear on its face, are carried out, it means the end of the absolutist regime in Russia. Though Nicholas has broken many solemn promises of his own and of his ancestors—notably in despoiling Finland of its ancient liberties—it is hardly conceivable that he would dare challenge the scorn of the world by recalling or annulling this latest manifesto. The step he has taken is irrevocable. Fear alone would be a sure guarantee of this, for to revoke what he has yielded would be to invite assassination. But there are other guarantees, and not the least of them is financial, and this, too, undoubtedly, when the inside history of this momentous manifesto is revealed, will be found to be one of, if not the greatest of the impelling reasons leading to its promulgation. The czar's government is badly in need of money and financiers from America and all the money centers of Europe have been in St. Petersburg arranging terms of another loan. Scarcely had they assembled in the capital before the strike which has paralyzed the trade and industry of the empire, began.

Money lenders are notoriously unsentimental. Finding a government supposedly responsible for the loan it sought, helpless before the internal conditions confronting it, they naturally suspected its stability and sought better guarantees than it could offer. Negotiations came to a halt. The autocracy, threatened as it has been for months by a smouldering political volcano, whose successive outbreaks have grown in violence, could guarantee nothing except by sacrifice of its prerogatives. This sacrifice it has made in fear and in its need of money. One would like to believe that these concessions had been granted out of the solicitous regard of the "little father" for the happiness of his children, as the opening portions of the manifesto imply, but in doing so one would be generous rather than just. What the czar has yielded is that which his ancestors had usurped and which he and they have held by force of arms. The restoration of these "inalienable rights" to the people comes with startling suddenness. The task of reorganizing the Russian government so as to secure for the people throughout that vast empire the benefits of a lawful freedom to which they are absolute strangers, seems almost an appalling one. It will fall to Witte as the first premier, creator of the czar's manifesto, and, so [illegible] only Russian statesman competent at all to deal with the tremendous responsibility. If genuine freedom is to be realized by the various peoples who make up the Russian empire, it is a work that will call for intimate knowledge of those races, keen human sympathy and the broadest statesmanship. May Witte prove equal to the task will be the universal prayer.

Oneida County Census Figures.

The complete census figures for the state have been given out by Secretary O'Brien and form an interesting bunch of statistics. They show that the Empire state has over 8,000,000 population, an increase of 11 per cent during the last five years. Over half the people are enumerated in Greater New York. Oneida county's population is 138,347, an increase of 6,547 since 1900. Utica's increase during that time was 6,552. The figures for the counties in this judicial district are of special importance at this time. There is a constitutional amendment pending which if approved by the people at the polls opens the way for the Legislature to provide a justice of the Supreme Court for every 60,000 of population in this district. There are now seven such judges. The new enumeration shows that the fifth judicial district will be entitled to nine judges of the Supreme Court. That of course depends upon the adoption of this constitutional amendment, for which every one should vote, and as well upon the favorable action of the Legislature, regarding which there can be no reasonable doubt if the amendment is adopted. That is a matter of great importance in this district.

For Oneida county the figures show that during the last five years the population of Utica increased 6,552 and that of Rome 1,224. Of the towns six show an increase and 20 show a decrease in population. The tabulated statement gives the figures for 18 villages in this county. Of these, eight show an increase, seven a decrease, and for three the comparison is not given. Of these, two were not incorporated in 1900. The third is held to be announced later. Clayville shows the largest decrease, 211, due to the closing of the mills, on account of which the families of many workingmen have been obliged to go elsewhere to find employment. When those mills start up again, as in all probability they will, the population of that village will return to its normal proportions. The increases and decreases in all the other villages are noted in two figures. With the exception of Clayville the village population has remained practically stationary. With the general situation Oneida county has every reason to feel entirely satisfied. As a whole it shows a healthy growth which there is every reason to believe will be continued during the next five years, at the end of which there will be another federal census.

The theatrical managers are quite as expert as the patent medicine men in the art of advertising. One of the schemes they resort to is to say that a play may be put off the boards by Anthony Comstock and if they can get up a discussion as to whether or no it is fit to be seen, good business is confidently expected. That seems to be about the way of it with "Mrs. Warren's Profession," which opened at the Garrick in New York Monday night. The play is by George Bernard Shaw. The English censors declared it impossible. It played in Germany but to small houses. All this was duly talked of beforehand and put into print by the wily press agent. The result justified the outlay. Single seats brought from $15 to $30 each in the hands of the speculators and the box office seats have been sold solid for two weeks in advance. No better demonstration could have been provided to show how that sort of advertising pays. There were as many women as men in the house and there were crowds of both on the sidewalk unable to gain entrance. The alleged expurgated edition of the play, while according to all reports is bad enough, so that it ought not to be produced, was not so bad as some anticipated and such were plainly disappointed. Nobody nowadays apologizes about going to the theater and there are comparatively few in any community who do not regard it as a perfectly proper place of amusement. Its standards have materially improved in recent years and the patronage with it. There is no excuse for running in on the stage any of these doubtful problem plays whose dialogue skirts along the edges, if it does not wade boldly into the sloughs of filth. If the dialogue is clever and bright, the danger is all the greater because insidious. To praise or defend vice and make it appear attractive is often the worst form of vice. The stage is responsible for enough without taking any chances. The patronage and support of the better element is worth more in the long run, to say nothing of the moral question involved.

Nowhere else is there more dependence placed on the betting as a barometer in the political campaign than in New York city. There are many in the metropolis who make a business of taking these chances and they endeavor so far as possible to guage public opinion and they make their wagers with the expectation of winning. The betting is by no means as sure an indication of a political outcome as some folks seem to think, but it is one of the straws calculated to show which way the wind is blowing. When Jerome's independent candidacy was first announced the odds were greatly against him. A week ago even the odds were two to one against him. The reports published yesterday morning show that now the odds are ten to eight and ten to seven in his favor and the likelihood is that they will reach two to one before next Tuesday. Everybody admires the splendid fight which he is making and particularly the way in which he is doing it. He is his own ablest advocate, the best witness and the best exhibit in his own behalf. If he can win, it will demonstrate that even in New York city the people can throw down the bosses if they really undertake the task. His success will be a great help to political independence all over the state.

The voters in the wards and towns of Oneida county are taking considerable interest in the several contests for supervisor. It is always very important to a ward or town who represents it in the board of county legislators. They have a good deal more to do with the fixing of the taxes than the member of assembly or senator, so far as the local and indi- [illegible] year additional importance is given to the matter because the supervisors elected next Tuesday will have a voice in the re-arranging of the Assembly districts and there is a partisan question involved. If the Republicans secure a majority they will have charge of the re-arrangement and the Democrats will do it if they win. Both sides of course claim that no unfairness or partiality will be shown, but human nature and political partisanship are pretty strong even in a board of supervisors and the party in power can be depended upon to make the districts as favorable as possible. In some places these contests are very lively and are attracting a great deal of attention. Each side realizes the importance of securing the majority.

The Republicans had an out door campaign meeting scheduled for last evening, but were obliged to postpone it on account of the weather. They might have expected as much when they made the arrangement in the first place, but even if last night had been like the night before or the night before that, there would have been no pleasure or profit in an out door meeting. The evenings in the latter part of October are sure to be chilly and disagreeable. These meetings are hard on the speakers and hard on the listeners, and a certain percentage of both can be depended upon to catch colds more or less severe. There are plenty of halls in the city that can be hired at reasonable rates and a suitable auditorium is the proper place to hold a political or any other kind of a meeting at this season of the year.

PRESS TOPICS.

The czar has at last granted his people a substantial degree of freedom. How he was persuaded the world does not know for the revolutionary movement had no leader and no one authoritatively stated its demands. Sergius Witte becomes the beneficiary for he alone of all Russian statesmen appeared to grasp the meaning of the situation. He will be the real ruler of Russia under the new regime with the czar no longer a despot but a mere figurehead.

Up-state is growing faster than the metropolis. In 1900 New York city had 7,510 more inhabitants than the rest of the state. Now, while it has grown, it is 38,064 less than the rest of the state.

The story that Speaker Cannon had been persuaded to oppose railroad rate regulation at the coming Congress is refuted by this answer to an inquiry from some of his constituents: "I stand by the House committee and the House in its action in passing the Esch-Townsend bill, and, if I am re-elected speaker, will substantially constitute the committee on interstate and foreign commerce as it was during the last Congress."

Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church agree that salaries of ministers, generally speaking, have not advanced to meet existing conditions as to cost of living, etc. The ministers can and do pass the plate for everybody but themselves.

Governors of western states and officials of railroads in that section are to hold a meeting at Salt Lake City to devise ways and means whereby the thousands of Americans who now go abroad may be induced to spend their money in seeing their own country. Among other things it is proposed to spend $500,000 a year in advertising the attractions of the west.

Many are asking why Grover Cleveland since he saw fit to write a letter favoring the re-election of Mayor McClellan, didn't do as much for District Attorney Jerome. Some of his enemies are saying that Mr. Cleveland is as much the puppet of Thomas F. Ryan, the financier, as Mayor McClellan is of Charles F. Murphy, the Tammany boss.

Emperor William of Germany, we are told, likes cigarettes but is not a slave to the habit. Of course no royal smoker could be a slave.

What if it is November? They say the real Indian summer never comes until this month.

A Paris journal has been investigating the question, "Why Do Men Wear Moustaches?" About a hundred answers were obtained. Six replied that it was too much trouble to shave, one declared that it was to hide his teeth, another that his long nose without it gave him a bad appearance, and three that it avoided colds. Three others maintained that it improved the air they breathed, and seven were of the opinion that a moustache was necessary to health. Seventeen men were content to state that they did it to please themselves, while only two said it was to please their wives. About sixty gave the reason that women did not like clean shaven men.

Reports as to the recent manoeuvers of the Chinese army all say that it is developing into a body that commands respect. The Chinese troops are being drilled by Japanese officers and are learning from them with surprising rapidity considering their slow progress when under the tutilage of Europeans.

Japan is to establish a line of steamers to ply between that country and South America. The purpose is to get cheap wheat from Argentina. Rice eating in Japan is giving way to bread made from wheat, or from a mixture of wheat and rice or other cereals. Japan's representative in Brazil is instructed by his government to collect data of trade possibilities between the two countries.

President McCurdy of the Mutual Life Insurance Company denies that he will retire before the expiration of his term in June next. If he doesn't let go then the policy holders will furnish enough proxies to rap him over the knuckles until he will be glad to drop out.

Americans are to build a modern hotel in London but Americans may not patronize it. When they go to London they will want to do as the Londoners do.

A novel and somewhat scientific method has recently been devised for the railway of Switzerland owned by the government to determine the half fare limit for children. Instead of an age limit, which has been the custom hitherto, a standard of height is to be employed and gauge and scale will be placed at each ticket office, so that the agent can tell at a glance whether the child requires a full fare. It is assumed that this is an equitable method of doing away with considerable imposition on the railroads, while at the same time children of small size who are above the legal age limit would be correspondingly benefited.

Secretary Bonaparte is doing his utmost to prevent the adoption of the proposed disfranchising amendment in Maryland. In a speech at Baltimore, he said: "From 45,000 to 46,000 of our present white voters could take no benefit from the socalled 'grandfather clause' of the amendment because they are, or because their fathers or grandfathers were, natives of other countries. My own father's father was a native of Corsica and was never a citizen of the United States. No doubt I have not been [illegible] a citizen of Maryland as some are, but, granting all that, ought they to have greater political rights than I have because their grandfathers were born in America?"

Count Witte, the man of the hour in Russia, is now in his 56th year, having been born in Tiflis in 1849. His father was of German descent and his mother was a Russian. He began his official career as a railway station master at $50 per month. He became superintendent of the road and in that capacity attracted the attention of high government officials who called him to [illegible] government enterprises, where he came under the notice of the czar, who has come now to trust him implicitly.

It seems that in China when an American naval official goes bird hunting in the rice fields and accidentally shoots a woman, much more fuss is made about it than when an American at home shoots a man in mistake for a deer. Admiral Train was knocked down in the mud and the mob held his son as a hostage until he was rescued by American marines. The incident may stiffen the Chinese boycott of American goods, but it is hoped at Washington that the possibilities of war may be avoided.

For three months, it is said, truckmen have been hauling tons of printed documents from the departments at Washington to be ground up into paper pulp on the outskirts of the city. The stuff was sold at very low prices to get it out of the way before the Landis investigating committee begins work. The acting public printer has cut his estimate for the next year nearly a million dollars under that for last year and if the printing laws are amended he promises still further reductions. "Leave to print" has been too freely granted to anybody and everybody at Washington.

Of course it just happens that the increase in the population of Oneida county is practically identical with the increase of the population in Utica. There were increases in other communities which about balanced the losses elsewhere and made the gain for Utica "all to the good," and helps Oneida county to hold ninth place among the counties of the state in point of population.

The assertion that "Mrs. Warren's Profession" was a naughty play was sufficient to crowd the Garrick Theater, where it was presented Monday night, and seats are already sold four weeks in advance, which shows how cautious New Yorkers are that their morals shall not be impaired. By the time Anthony Comstock finishes the legal proceedings the play will be as well-advertised as "Sapho," which everybody wanted to see a few years ago to discover if it was as shocking as represented.

The czar never did any notable deeds with his sword, but he has apparently saved his throne by a single stroke of his pen.

Prof. Oncken, who is lecturing at the University of Chicago on history, is a most accomplished linguist. He spoke English almost without a foreign accent after being in London a month. He is said never to be at loss for an English word, though he was once for the German equivalent of a common one. Some one had asked him at the Quadrangle Club: "Herr Oncken, what is the German word for furnace?" After hesitating a long while Herr Oncken gave the German equivalent for what would translate in English "the central heating plant." He was as much amused as the Quadranglers at not being able to give a better German synonym, and the laugh was general when somebody suggested: "Fancy your wife asking you the last thing at night: 'My dear, did you 'tend to the central heating plant?'"

"What a difference in the suffering at time of childbirth

when Dr. R. V. Pierce's medicines are used," writes Mrs. Edmon Jacobs, of Bargersville, Johnson Co., Ind. "I had not heard of Dr. Pierce's medicines three years ago when I was confined, so had to suffer almost death. Before baby was born I could not be on my feet without two persons holding me. The baby was a boy, weighing 9¾ pounds, and for some weeks after his birth I suffered severe pain. Last fall, following the advice of a neighbor, my husband bought me Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, which I took during the winter, and in March, I gave birth to a baby boy, weighing 10½ lbs. I was only in labor two hours and was on my feet without help until thirty minutes before baby was born. He is now three months old and weighs 18 lbs. I know it was Dr. Pierce's medicine that saved me from suffering. I advise all women to take Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, also his 'Pleasant Pellets,' if necessary."

"The advice of a neighbor."

"Following the advice of a neighbor." What a weight of confirmatory evidence there is in those six words. The neighbor had tried the "Favorite Prescription" and recommended it. Mrs. Jacobs has also tried it and proved its wonderful properties and now she recommends it. Beside such testimony as this its maker's words are unimportant. Mrs. Jacobs' experience is a fact. Her neighbor's experience is a fact. The written experiences of 500,000 other women are facts. There is no theory about it. There can be no question about it. In every neighborhood in this broad land there are women who have been cured by the "Favorite Prescription." It has cured more cases of female complaint than all other medicines for women combined. It is the only medicine of its kind invented by a skilled specialist in medicine—a regularly graduated

CHAPTER XX

THE BLOW FALLS.

Dinner that night was anything but a cheerful meal; in fact, it was evident that the party possessed that fatal bar to success—a spirit of antagonism. Drysdale and Grace Croydon maintained a careful silence, and Mrs. Delroy was so obviously depressed that her husband was alarmed.

"I don't believe this stay in the country is doing you a bit of good, Edith," he observed.

"I don't feel very well to-night," she said. "I think I shall lie down right after dinner."

"I would," he agreed. "You must save yourself all you can. I can't have you getting ill, you know. If I'd had any sense, I'd have got you away from that New York whirl a month ago."

"I'm not going to be ill," she assured him; "I'll be all right in a day or two."

As soon as the meal was over, she and her sister disappeared upstairs while the men lighted their cigars and strolled down to the boathouse to view the preparations made by the Grahams for the protection of the necklace. The night was very close, with a promise of rain unmistakable.

They went through the boathouse without finding anyone, but on the pier beyond old Graham was sitting, gazing across the water and smoking an odoriferous pipe. Between his knees he held a Winchester repeater and a revolver-butt stuck from a case at his belt.

Delroy laughed quietly as he looked at him.

"Why, you're a regular arsenal," he said. "You're taking it in earnest for sure."

"Might as well be on th' safe side, sir," responded Graham, sententiously.

"And where's the necklace?"

"Lowered from th' end of th' pier, sir."

"No chance of it getting away?"

"I tied th' knots, sir."

"All right—that settles it. You're not going to sit out here all night, I hope?"

"Willum takes his trick at midnight, sir. He's gone over t' th' house t' bring a cot an' some beddin' down t' th' boathouse. We'll take turn an' turn about."

"Well," said Delroy, turning away, "I see I can sleep without worrying any over the safety of the necklace. If there's anything you want, Graham, in the way of eatables or drinkables, don't hesitate to send to the butler for them."

"Thank 'ee, sir; but I guess we'll let th' drinkables alone fer th' present. We'll cook our own meals on th' stove in th' boathouse."

"What do you want to do that for?"

"Well," returned Graham slowly, "then we'll know that they ain't nothin' in them that hadn't ought t' be there."

Delroy laughed again, long and loud, and even Drysdale smiled.

"You've been reading a dime novel!" cried Delroy, when he had got his breath. "Deadwood Dick—I didn't think it of you, Graham!"

"I don't read nothin', sir, but th' Noo York Record—"

"It's the same thing," Delroy interjected.

"But I don't believe in takin' no risks—when you come after th' necklace, sir, it's a-goin' t' be right here."

"I haven't a doubt of it," his employer assured him. "It would be a mighty desperate thief who'd tackle you. You're all right, Graham. But I'd go into the boathouse if it rains."

"I'll see about it, sir," said Graham, and refilled his pipe.

As they passed through the boathouse again, they perceived young "Willum" busily engaged in making up his bed on a cot in one corner. Delroy nodded to him and passed on without speaking.

"It's too nice a night to spend in the house," said Drysdale, a little abruptly, as they mounted the steps to the door. "I believe I'll go for a tramp. I'll take my raincoat, though; then I needn't hurry back."

"I didn't know you were such a lover of nature, Jack," observed Delroy.

"I'm not; but I feel like tramping to-night."

Delroy shrugged his shoulders, as Drysdale entered the outer hall with them and took down his raincoat from the rack. Thomas, who was stationed in the vestibule, helped him on with it.

"Good-bye," he called from the door; "don't look for me for an hour or two."

"All right, we won't worry," answered Delroy; "though, for my part," he added, as he and Tremaine went on through the hall together, "I prefer a book before the fire. There's a chill in the air that strikes through one after a while, and Jack'll soon get enough of it. But I'd better go up and see how my wife's getting along. You'll excuse me?"

"Certainly—and stay as long as you like. I'm going to my room presently, myself—I have some letters to write."

Delroy nodded and went on up the stair. Tremaine sank into one of the chairs before the fire and watched the blazing logs, with an expression intent, alert, as though he were waiting for someone.

A door opened and closed, a light step crossed the hall, a hand was laid upon the chair-back.

"Oh," said Miss Croydon, "I thought—where is Mr. Drysdale?"

Tremaine arose slowly.

"Drysdale," he said, with a meaning look which did not escape her, "was unable to resist the charms of the evening. He has gone for a walk. He said he would not be back for a couple of hours. Please sit down."

It was more of a command than an invitation, and she yielded to it reluctantly.

"I can stay but a moment," she said. "Edith is not at all well and needs me.

"I was waiting for you," he said calmly. "I don't think you quite realize yet that I am in earnest."

"To be in earnest would be infamous."

"No indeed; not to be in earnest would be infamous. I'm paying you the greatest compliment I'm capable of paying any woman. I ask you to be my wife."

"Why keep up that mockery?" she demanded scornfully.

"It is not a mockery. The past is dead."

"It is not dead; you have brought it to life. It is becoming intolerable."

"I know it; therefore I offer to make it tolerable. I have no wish to persecute anyone."

"Then why do you?"

"Necessity——"

"Oh, nonsense!"

"Listen," he said, with sudden intensity leaning toward her and looking in her eyes, "if I can prove to you that the past is really dead—dead past recall—dead past hope of resurrection—will you marry me?"

She looked at him without shrinking.

"No!" she answered.

"I see what it is," he said between his teeth; "it is not that I do not awaken an answering chord in you—I do—I can see it—we were set apart for each other. It is not that you do not long to break through this silly English cage which has always hedged you about—I remember that you are really French in every drop of your blood. It is this pink-and-white nonentity who stands between us. You've fallen in love with his baby face—but it's not the love of a woman for a man, it's not the love of a mother for her child. That other love you as yet know nothing of—but it shall be my part to teach it you—my privilege—my great mission—and I shall enjoy the fruits of it. Deep in your heart you know that the pale feeling you have for this boy is not love—not strong, passionate, mature love—the love that seizes and conquers, that takes one through heaven and through hell. Not many women are capable of such a love—they're too cold, too selfish. But you're capable of it, and when it comes to you, as I swear it shall come, you'll not stop to question the past; you'll look only toward the future—you'll not stop to ask what the world thinks; you'll heed only the longing of your own heart."

She had sat spell-bound, gazing at him, chained by the sound of his voice, by his vehemence. She roused herself with an effort.

"If I should love," she said, "I should at least choose a gentleman——"

He interrupted with a dry laugh.

"There spoke the Philistine—the English variety! Your heart wasn't in it! Let me tell you that you wouldn't stop to ask what he was—he would be only the man you love. And have you chosen a gentleman? Does a gentleman listen at the turn of the stairs to a conversation not intended for him? He did listen; he told you of his ridiculous doubts of you. What right had he to doubt you, to make conditions, to demand explanations? Explanations from a woman like you!"

"He has a right—"

"He has no right—he's a beggar at your table! If he can't hold you, it's his fault, not yours. And he can't hold you—he's too weak every way! Ah, I could hold you!"

"Yes—perhaps even beat me!"

He looked at her, his eyes agleam.

"Perhaps," he agreed, his mouth working with eagerness. "Perhaps I should. But if I did, you would stab me in the night."

He was weaving the spell about her again; she gazed at him, half fascinated.

"Yes," she said intensely; "yes—I should like to do it now!"

His eyes flashed with sudden triumph.

"And yet you think yourself in love with Drysdale!" he cried. "Did he ever awaken a wish like that in you?"

"No; thank God!" and she shivered slightly.

He was radiant, assured.

"Nor any other feeling except a baby liking! Yet you yield to his fancied right; you promise to explain to him! It was to do that you came here to-night—"

"Who told you that?"

"He did."

"Then why isn't he here?"

"He preferred to commune with nature," Tremaine answered, in an indescribable tone. "Think of any man preferring nature to you—preferring anything to you—life, honor—anything! Do you know what I'm longing to do? I'm longing to take you in my arms and hold you fast and kiss you on those red lips of yours—kiss you, kiss you—"

He was half out of his chair, leaning over her. Another instant—but his ears caught the opening of a door.

"Here comes Delroy," he said in another tone, rising suddenly, his hands gripped tensely at his sides. "Damn him!"

She lay back in her chair, relaxed suddenly, panting with exhaustion.

"I'll go," he added hoarsely. "I can't keep up the farce of polite conversation—besides I have some letters to write. Good night."

For an hour or more, Delroy sat alone before the fire reading. At last he yawned, laid down his book, arose and walked to the door. The wind was rising; he could hear it roaring in the trees; and every minute a broad flash of lightning illumined the clouds on the horizon.

"There's a storm coming," he said to Thomas, who was nodding at his post. "I wonder where the devil Drysdale went? He'd better be getting in pretty soon."

As though in answer to the thought, a dark figure appeared suddenly on the walk, strode up the steps, and opened the door. It was Drysdale.

He took off his coat, threw it to Thomas, and went on into the inner hall, where he stood rubbing his hands before the fire, with a face so hopeless, fierce, despairing, that Delroy was fairly startled.

"You may go to bed, Thomas," he said: [illegible] matter, Jack?" he asked. "You're looking regularly done up."

Drysdale turned with a start.

"Oh, it's you, is it, Dickie? Where is Grace?"

"Upstairs with my wife."

"Where has she been this evening?"

"She's been down here talking with Tremaine most of the time—but I say—hold on—what ails the fellow?" he demanded, staring after the other as he bounded up the stairs. "Well, that beats me!"

He was still staring when Tremaine appeared at the landing and came down, a packet of letters in his hand.

"I want to put these in the bag," he said, "so they'll get off by the early mail."

"It's on the rack out there," Delroy replied, and the other went past him into the outer hall. He was back in a moment.

"That's a good evening's work," he said, with a sigh of satisfaction. "But what's the matter? You look as though you'd seen a ghost."

"Drysdale came in just now looking as though he'd seen one, all nerves and raw flesh—and stalked upstairs as mad as a hornet about something."

"Ah," said Tremaine, with just the flicker of an eyelash, "and yet one would have thought that a walk through the silence of the night would calm his nerves. There comes the rain!"

There was a hiss, a flash, and a great crash of thunder split the firmament apart and shook the house to its foundations. They could hear the rain dashing in sheets against the windows.

"That's a storm for sure; listen to the wind. Drysdale got in just in time. But I never saw him like that before; something extraordinary must have happened to him. He's been out of humor for a day or two. I wonder, now, if he was caught in that steel crash? By Jove, I did hear him say that he'd bought a block of stock on margin!"

A gleam of triumph indescribable flashed into Tremaine's eyes.

"That may explain it," he said, with studied carelessness.

"Yes—but it doesn't excuse it. If a man can't keep his temper when he loses, he hasn't any business to speculate. Hello, who's that?"

Someone was pounding at the outer door. Delroy strode to it and threw back the bolt. It flew open and young Graham staggered rather than walked into the hall, hatless, coatless, soaked with rain, his eyes staring, his face rigid with horror.

"Good God, man; what is it?" cried Delroy.

He opened his mouth; but only a low rumbling came from his throat.

"Come!" cried Delroy sharply. "Be a man! What is it?"

By a mighty effort Graham pulled himself together.

"Father's killed! he whispered hoarsely.

Periodicals.

The November magazine number of the Outlook has a sketch and portrait of Charles E. Hughes, counsel for the legislative committee conducting the insurance investigation. The Outlook also has a picture of William Travers Jerome at his headquarters, and "The Spectator" gives a most interesting account of the mass meeting of the "Jerome Nominators" at Carnegie Hall recently. Some prominent figures in the fall campaign are sketched in the paper, "Defenders of Self Government." E. Douglass Shields writes about "Dorchester House," the home of the American ambassador at the Court of St. James. The paper has some special illustrations of Whitelaw Reid, his wife and views of Dorchester House. Edward Everett Hale continues his "Tarry at Home Travels," writing about "Rhode Island" this month. Arthur Chapman tells of "A Day with a Forest Ranger." Other papers are "Japanese Pictures," "The Collection of Antiquities," "The Twin Cities of the Magyars" and "An Upstart on Opera."

In the Outing Magazine for November Jesse Lynch Williams writes about "The Workers of the Great Lakes," giving an entertaining account of the industries of these inland waters. Robert Dunn discusses "The Country Club: A National Expression," and points out its advantages and pleasures. "Amid Birch and Balsam" is a hunting paper by Edwin C. Kent. Rene Bache tells of "Planting Fish as a Business Enterprise," and A. C. Laut writes of "The Sea-Otter Hunters." There is an installment of Alfred Henry Lewis' serial, "The Throwback," two or three good stories and many articles relating to outdoor sports. The Outing Magazine improves with each issue, and its November number is an attractive and very readable publication.

"The Commercialism of Literature" is the leading article in the Atlantic Monthly for November. It is written by Henry Holt, a well known publisher, and was prompted by the book, "A Publisher's Confession," published some time since. "How to Know the Fallacies" is an interesting paper by Samuel McChord Crothers. Robert DeCourcy Ward discusses "Immigration and the South," and Lucy M. Salmon reports "Recent Progress in the Study of Domestic Science." Frederick W. Coburn tells of "Telephone Development in the United States," and William H. Allen shows "How Statistics are Manufactured" in giving "The Experiences of a Census Taker." Among other contributors are Sewell Ford, Grace Ellery Channing, Henry C. Merwin, Agnes Repplier, E. T. Brewster, K. Asakawa and Mildred Howells.

The World To-Day for November publishes a portrait and sketch of Charles E. Hughes, counsel for the legislative committee in the insurance investigations. It also gives a sketch of George W. Perkins of the New York Life Insurance Company. An interesting paper is "Country Library Pioneering in Massachusetts," by Edward Kirk Titus. Shailer Mathews discusses "Reforming Athletics in the Central West," and Alfred Sidney Johnson writes about "Observing an Eclipse in Labrador." "Chicago's Traction Question" is discussed by Edward B. Tolman, and "Japan as a Commercial Rival," by Wolf von Schierbrand. "The Glory of All Lands" is a descriptive account of the beauties of the Holy Land, by Lewis Gaston Leary, who was for several years a teacher in the American College at Beirut. The World To-Day has several others who contribute articles, besides its review of events of the month, etc.

ADVOCATES MANUAL TRAINING

PRINCIPAL MEAD OF THE ACADEMY

Made an Excellent Address at the Meeting of the Parents and Teachers' Association at the Wetmore School Yesterday Afternoon and It Was Much Enjoyed by All in Attendance.

Principal Emory L. Mead of the academy was the speaker at the parents and teachers' meeting at the Wetmore Street School yesterday afternoon. Miss Elizabeth E. Murphy, principal of the school, presided, and in addition to the address by Prof. Mead, there was a vocal solo, "Sunset," by Miss Jennie Hartford, and an instrumental number, the "Pilgrim Chorus," from Tannhauser, by Miss Irma Smith of New York city, who is Miss Hartford's guest.

In opening his address Prof. Mead spoke of some of the changes that have taken place in educational methods and conditions since the days when he was a school boy. He recalled that in the earlier days the children could be seen going to school with their lunch boxes or baskets, whereas now they have different means of getting to and from the school and are not so often seen with the lunch. We had all sorts of grades, too, in those days, said Prof. Mead, and one teacher was expected to cover the whole. The methods of teaching were also different. The child was told at the outset to learn the first ten letters of the alphabet and he went to work at this lesson without any instruction. The teacher was also expected to teach geography and algebra and so on. In passing through this school this afternoon I have noted the immense difference in the old and the new methods of teaching.

We hear much in these days about the nobility of the teacher's calling. It is unquestionably a noble work and yet I do not think that this characterization of it gives us much material comfort. Where there are children there is education and education ought to begin in the home. In former days the child was allowed more time for being taught in the home than is the case to-day. The schools have reached out and taken more of the time of the children and have, to some extent, usurped the prerogatives of the home. I sometimes think we have taken too much of the time of the child from the home.

We have a great country here and I can not imagine any sadder thing than that, with its immense resources, it should fail to fulfill its mission. We are, in reality, the only country that has the opportunity of placing before the world the example of a pure democracy. When I think of the fact that the boys and girls whom we are now engaged in training and educating are to settle this question I appreciate the importance of our work. Then, too, the children who are now growing up are to have great responsibilities and opportunities in the matter of the business development of the country. That development depends on the children of to-day. The boys are to be the business men and the politicians of to-morrow and the girls are to have a great influence in determining the future of the country in a social and also in a political way.

What is the kind of work that is going to make the boys and the girls best qualified? This is a question that the schools are to solve. I am not going to enter into a discussion as to what are the best text books. I believe, however, that the best course of study is a combination of book work and manual training. I do not believe there is the slightest saving grace in books alone. I do not believe that knowledge alone can make an ideal citizen. If our schools are in any way deficient it is in their failure to fully and generally combine book work and manual training. I did not, at one time, believe in manual training. I have now been thoroughly converted to the idea. I believe that manual training should go hand in hand with book work. I have seen the results of manual training and I believe in it fully. It makes the boys and the girls practical. We can not find a perfect substitute for the training the boy received on the farm when he might be called on at any minute to mend a harness, attach a new share to the plow or do any one of a hundred and one things of like character. We can, however, do something to supply such a training. If I could have everything my own way I would have an industrial plant connected with every school. I would even have the girls learn cooking. This is an awful thing to say nowadays, as cooking is about the last thing a girl wants to learn. She expects to be married and be mistress of a home, but she is going to have cooks and other servants to do the work. If the girls were here this afternoon I might, perhaps, say something that would not offend them, and yet might give them a different view of the matter.

Germany seems to be getting ahead of us in this industrial work. The Germans are realizing more than we the necessity of this manual training for the industrial development of a country. I would have manual training, not as a fad, but as an essential part of the school course. I would also have due attention paid to the physical training.

I might also speak of another phase of the matter. Children are in a sense capital to be invested. There are two kinds of dividends and any school that does not return dividends is not a success. The first dividend is the enjoyment that we take in education and culture, the second is the social position. I do not mean social caste, but there is a social position a person may take by virtue of intellectual attainments. Then there is a third dividend, and that comes to us in dollars and cents. It pays, as a matter of hard cash, to educate the children. Suppose every school and every church in this community were to be done away with. Where would the value of real estate go to? No community could prosper without its schools and the educational advantages afforded by the churches.

To arrange for the next meeting Miss Murphy appointed a committee consisting of Mrs. Fisher, Mrs. Cunningham and Mrs. Donlon, from the parents, and Miss Callahan, Miss Balch and Miss Harty, from the teachers.

Lease Was Not Refused.

In connection with the purchase of new grounds by the Yahnundasis Golf Club, the statement was recently published that the reason for purchasing grounds near New Hartford is mainly the expiration of the lease of the grounds and the refusal of the owners to renew the lease. William Blaikie, who is one of the largest owners of the present grounds, says that there was no refusal on his part to renew the lease; that he offered to sell the present location and made an appointment with one of the members to look at additional land.

Cars Stop at the Door.

Soon after the opening of the Convention Hall Roller Skating Rink the management of the local trolley system discovered that more persons wanted to alight at the rink in Lafayette street than any other single point, except, perhaps, the Genesee street crossing. Consequently a stop was arranged in front of the place and during the hours that the rink is open all cars find it necessary to stop there. People go to the rink from all parts of the city and its suburbs.

Fowls and Bicycle Stolen.

Charles Bauer of 315 Albany street yesterday reported to the police that several fancy fowls had been stolen from his hen house during the previous night.

Haydns Rehearsing.

At its regular rehearsal last night the Haydn Male Chorus made further arrangements for concerts to be given during the fair in the Auditorium the week beginning December 5 by Grace M. E. Church. There is to be an entertainment every night of the fair and the Haydns are to give two of the programmes. The

OTTO L. ENDRES

To the Editor of the Utica Daily Press:

Nobody denies that conditions exist that cause strikes, lockouts and a growing unemployed labor problem. You have noticed the rise in prices of necessities not in accordance with wages. You also know that the difference between rich and poor becomes more marked every day. Those things have come about logically and under Democratic or Republican governments. The socialist knows it must come even worse. He knows that if labor will bring $10 as wages per day, prices will go up accordingly, and he will be none the better off. Why? Because business under private ownership must be rewarded with a profit.

Socialism claims when things are produced for use and all tools of production and distribution belong to the people collectively, profit, rent, interest, etc., must disappear, and every worker who, according to United States statistics, produces on the average $2,400 worth of goods a year can live accordingly. The necessity of saving ceases, the unemployed problem is solved, and all people can enjoy life. Every child will receive the best possible education and every aged worker will receive a pension that insures independence. These ideal conditions can only be brought about with thinking voters, and it is your duty for your sake, your wife and children's sake, for the sake of progress, that you investigate socialism. We don't want your vote excepting you know what you are voting for, and why.

We hold that the earth belongs to all the people and that no portion of it can be owned by individuals; it can only be occupied. People that profit by present conditions and out of selfish greed care naught for others, try hard to create an impression, upon those who don't care to think and who will yell and follow a crowd just because it is a crowd (whether right or wrong) they don't take the trouble to investigate. That Socialism is impossible.

Let us see what the people are already doing collectively, although private interests not only corrupt such service, but through their political influence many utterly unfit men are appointed to responsible positions over others who are entitled to them by reason of their experience. (Look at the postal service.) Those impossibles and their tools say: Graft would exist under Socialism just the same, but we simply answer: If the public does all the work now performed by individuals for private interests and the letting of contracts ceases, who would offer bribe and what for? Besides the carrying of mail, we publicly or collectively build forts, lighthouses and quite a number of municipalities own and operate gas works, water works, electric works, furnishing those comodities at half what we pay. In the west a number of farming districts have mutual telephone service, paying for installation and ownership of the 'phone between $20 and $30 and $1.25 to $1.50 for the central exchange per annum.

Many foreign countries own and operate railroads. In England and Australia many municipalities own street car lines. They have museums, art galleries, magnificent bath houses, laundries, abattoirs, markets, piers, docks, parks, cemeteries, crematories. Many provide concerts, lectures, gymnasiums, skating rinks. In some cities in Belgium the authorities build dwellings, while France can boast of being pioneer in having some towns which actually feed and cloth the children and provide all school supplies at public expense. Of course our impossibles may say that taxes would be tremendous to try and accomplish this, and we answer that when the public has a revenue from commodities, taxes will fall away entirely.

Any country to be governed by the people, for the people must in the first place have independently thinking voters. Politics, or an interest in government, should be exercised by everybody the year around and be considered ahead of everything. It is everybody's duty to help make conditions so that no child shall live in want or be handicapped in later years by not having had a chance to get a first class education no matter whether parents want it or or not, that no widow suffers, that poverty and poor houses are no longer possible. The workers who produce everything don't want charity, they want justice. Then everybody that works will receive the full value of such product and nobody will be able to exploit anybody.

The public certainly will then not adulterate food and other products to profit thereby and intemperence will cease as soon as the public governs the liquor traffic and individual profit is out of the question.

Socialists want universal suffrage for women as well as men. The enobling effect of women taking an interest in politics will tend to purify elections and campaigns. An expression Mr. Jerome of New York made yesterday shows plain how much political knowledge he expects the voters to have when he said: "Don't vote for me because you think I have a show to win or refrain because you think I have not."

In Russia hundreds of men and women sacrificed their lives in the endeavor to obtain suffrage. Here, where we have it, it is a sort of sport with a good many, too much bother for others and a single month in the year is supposed to suffice to give every voter plenty of political material to shape his opinion for an intelligent vote. Men often not overintelligent will dismiss Socialism as Utopian, impossible or even nonsensical, although they never tried to really find out why. Other men not underintelligent who have studied and carefully weighed the pros and cons, hail Socialism as of unlimited beneficial possibilities for mankind.

INQUEST IN MURDER CASE

BEGUN IN ROME YESTERDAY

Several Witnesses Sworn in the Matter of the Recent Fatal Stabbing Affray—Jim Collangelo Arraigned on the Charge of Murder in the First Degree—Examination Set Down for To-Day.

Rome, Oct. 31.—In Chief of Police Barry's office at the police station this afternoon Coroner Hubbard commenced the inquest over the death of Sophia Daney Blaisdel, the young woman who was murdered last Sunday evening in the house occupied by George Gurnsey, 109 Second street.

The first witness was Mrs. Lissie Webb, aunt of the dead girl, who is the common law wife of Gurnsey. She was sworn to identify the body of the dead girl as her niece. She saw the dead girl lying on her son's bed upstairs after she had been stabbed, but she did not see the stabbing.

James Donaher of Elizabethtown, N. Y., who boards at the Mohawk boarding house, one of the inmates of Gurnsey's place that Sunday night, testified that he had been in Rome five or six weeks, and was down on Second street Sunday night, and was invited into Gurnsey's by a couple of fellows who stood by the front fence. After he had been in the place a short time some one asked him if he was not going to buy the drinks, so he gave one of them a quarter and they went out and got half a pint of whisky, which was drunk. A little later Jim Collangelo came in and he bought and some one else bought the rounds also, the drinks all coming from the outside. This was the first time that he had ever seen Jim and the other Italian. Witness said that he went out into the shed and when he came back into the room he saw Jim Collangelo waving both hands in the air, and heard the girl say that she had been stabbed, and then saw her run upstairs. Witness followed her upstairs and saw the blood flowing from her throat, and then he said he went and got a doctor. When witness entered the room after being out in the shed he said they were all scrapping and that while he was in the house there were four or five scraps. At one time he said he saw Sophia have a butcher knife in her hands, but did not hear her threaten anybody.

This concluded the inquest for to-day. Coroner Hubbard said that he had two physicians yet to swear, but would take their testimony later.

At 3:15 this afternoon Jim Collangelo was arraigned on the charge of murder in the first degree, the court room being filled with spectators, mostly Italians. The warrant was issued on information of Chief of Police Barry, on a deposition sworn to by James Donaher, who was sworn on the inquest, "on information and belief and from observation."

The defendant was represented by D. Frank Searle, who formally demanded an examination for his client and asked that the examination be set down for Thursday or Friday, till after the coroner had completed his inquest, for Mr. Searle said he would like to hear what the doctors have to say as to what they found. By consent of District Attorney Willis, the examination was adjourned till 10 a. m. Wednesday, and Collangelo was taken to jail.

The twelve witnesses in the police station have not yet been arraigned. They will be detained as witnesses in the case.

LOOKING FOR THE MURDERER.

The Case of the Man Who Was Found Dead in the Woods.

Rome, Oct. 31.—C. J. Vowinkel, coroner at Oswego, arrived here this morning to see if he could get any trace of the murderer of Frank Vitetta of this city, the Italian whose body was found riddled with bullets in the woods near Oswego on Sunday morning, Vitetta being the one who on the night of the tenth of October slashed the throat of Georgi Randasso in this city and then made his escape. Vitetta being undoubtedly shot out of revenge for the act committed here. Coroner Vowinkel examined the trunk that belonged to Vitetta which is at the police station, and he also interviewed Joe Cutronero, cousin of Vitetta, who works at the locomotive works, and also Steve Granda, who conducts an Italian boarding house at 206 John street, where Vitetta boarded. He could not learn anything that would tend to throw any light on the case. Coroner Vowinkel left here for Utica to see if he could locate the brother of the murdered man and to see if he desired to claim the body.

Coroner Vowinkel was in Utica yesterday. With Sergeant Hill Coroner Vowinkel found the Utica brother at 74 Third avenue. The Utican had heard nothing about the finding of the body and when he was told he was greatly overcome. He is to go to Oswego to identify the body. Coroner Vowinkel made inquiries of several parties in Rome but could find out nothing that would throw light on the murder.

MISS HODGE MISSING.

Young Woman Leaves Home and Her Whereabouts Are Unknown.

Rome, Oct. 31.—Miss Ruth E. Hodge, aged 18, an attractive young lady, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Jay N. Hodge of 208 West Liberty street, left her home at 6:40 yesterday morning to go to her work in the Empire wire mill, where she was employed, and nothing has since been seen or heard from her by her parents. Mr. Hodge gave out this fact about 4 o'clock this afternoon, not till he had given up hopes that his daughter might return. The family adopted the girl when she was two years old and gave her a good home where everything was pleasant. When Ruth left the house she wore a dark brown skirt, white shirt waist, a short light coat and a red hat. Her cheeks are red and she has dark blue eyes and dark lashes and walks fast. About five years ago she suffered from melancholia and was in a Utica hospital for about three months. Since then she has not been herself. She has been heard to threaten to take her own life. Once she said that she felt like going into a room and turning on the gas. Her parents can not give any reason for her leaving home, as she was a quiet girl. They are fearful that the worst has happened to her. On the morning she left the house she did not go to the mill and the ticket agents at the depot do not know of her purchasing a ticket. It is said that she thought considerable of a member of the Baer Opera Company who recently played here for a week.

The girl left the house Sunday and said she was going to Sunday school. At 5 p. m. that day she was seen in the Utica depot by a Roman, and just before the 7:23 train went west Monday morning she was seen in the Rome depot.

BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS.

Doings at a Regular Meeting Held Yesterday Afternoon.

Rome, Oct. 31.—At the regular meeting of the board of public works this afternoon an electric light was asked for between Doxtater avenue and Lovett street; referred for investigation.

Charles Stevens presented a communication stating that there never was a gutter in front of his premises on Stanwix street. He asked that this board cause a gutter to be turned there and also for grade stakes so he can lay a walk; granted.

There appears to be a misunderstanding as to the routes of the collectors of ashes, many people not understanding them. The routes were ordered published.

Stakes were ordered set for the raising of the flag sidewalks in front of St. Joseph's Church on Ridge street and in front of the school property on the same street.

Mrs. Louisa McPherson asked that [illegible] property on South James street, now rented to other parties.

Stakes were ordered placed for the raising of the flag walk in front of the Oster property on North James street, above Vine street.

Clerk Bouton stated that he had figured up the value of the property outside of the corporation tax district, the total being $1,636,146.97. The property owners heretofore outside have paid into the highway fund $1 for every $250 of valuation, or else worked it out. This would make a total of $6,544.58, of which the railroad company paid $3,500, and the balance of $3,272.19, which should have been paid by the property owners outside, has not all been paid, either in cash or worked out. There is a mix-up caused by the new city charter by which only $3,272.19 can now be collected from both the railroad company and the outside district. This matter was referred to Clerk Bouton, City Attorney Mason, City Engineer Plunkett and Chairman Shelley of this board to see if they can get things straightened for next year. All warrants of the pathmasters were ordered returned to the city clerk by November 10, so that those who have not paid or worked out their road tax may be made to do so by the Board of Supervisors.

HALLOWE'EN IN ROME.

Many Enjoyable Parties—One Was Overdone Somewhat.

Rome, Oct. 31.—There were a great many Hallowe'en parties in this city to-night. A pleasant party was held at the Y. M. C. A. There was a large pumpkin on which fortunes were written, and persons blindfolded walked up and stuck a knife in the pumpkin, their fortune being the one in which the knife was placed. There were also other modes of fortune telling. The large room was darkened and a ghost walked in and gave a ghostly recitation. There was bobbing for apples and other amusements and music, all having a fine time.

The senior class of the Academy held their party in the barn of Thomas Marsh out on Kent street and there was something doing, especially when they received a call from the Juniors about 10 o'clock who broke up the party for the time being. The barn was bombarded and the windows were broken. Pails of water were secured and when the Seniors made their appearance they were baptized and there was a fight with sticks. The barn was decorated with bones, pumpkins, lanterns, etc. After all became quiet, dancing was enjoyed until after midnight. The whole affair was disgraceful. Grover C. Flint, a member of the Senior class, was badly injured on the head by being hit with the barn door which fell on him. The Seniors kidnapped Merwin Rowland, a member of the Junior class, and they say that he got what was coming to him. The police had to be called on.

Miss Julia Cecilia White of 107 North Jay street gave a party in White's Hall, 242 West Dominick street, ten couples being present. Dancing was enjoyed and the hall was becomingly decorated for the occasion with pumpkins, squash, corn stalks, etc. The dance programme contained questions, the answers to which were all to be found on a copper cent, and the partners were chosen by the answers given. Some of the questions and answers follow: Q. Means of infliction? A. Lashes. Q. A messenger? A. One cent. Q. A devoted young man? A. (beau) bow. Q. A place of worship? A. Temple. Q. Spring flowers? A. Tulips (two lips). Q. The first American settler? A. Indian. Q. Three weapons? A. Arrows, etc. Refreshments were served. The entertainment was unique and enjoyable. A flashlight picture was taken by C. B. Howland.

Miss Margaret O'Donnell of 723 Calvert street, and Miss Florence O'Donnell of 628 West Thomas street gave pleasant parties.

Miss Beatrice Rougeot of 619 Floyd avenue gave a pleasant party at which the usual Hallowe'en games were played and refreshments served. Amusement was created by the guests, blindfolded, trying to pin tails on a donkey in the place where they should be pinned. Some of them got pinned onto the head. There was also bobbing for apples, etc.

Arabelle Perry of West Dominick street gave an enjoyable Hallowe'en party last night, about twenty being present.

Misses Irma and Gladys, daughters of Deputy Surrogate and Mrs. John S. Schwarz of 211 West Bloomfield street, pleasantly entertained 20 of their young friends and they had a good time. The rooms were decorated with pumpkins, cornstalks, lanterns, etc., and refreshments appropriate to the occasion were served and games were played.

The members of the class of 1905, Rome Free Academy, gave a farewell surprise party to one of their number, Miss Grace Weller of 306 North James street, meeting at the home of Miss Leotta Fuller, 416 North James street. The surprise was complete. Miss Weller was presented a handsome bronze clock, placed in a neatly arranged basket made to represent an airship, decorated with the class colors, brown and gold. At 11 o'clock the party went to the Palace Lunch Parlors, where Caterer Williams served them with pumpkin pie, milk and cheese, the tables being set in the form of a maltese cross, the table spreads being the colors of the class. In pieces of cheese at each plate Mr. Williams had placed a stick pin, to which was tied the colors of the class. A lighted jack-o'-lantern was placed in the center of the table. The class songs and yells were given and all had a big time. Miss Weller and her mother will soon go to Richfield Springs, where Mr. Weller has opened a barber shop.

In Brief.

Rome, Oct. 31.—R. J. Smith is a well known local checker player. Another good player hails from Syracuse by the name of Reynolds, and Mr. Smith has been aching to set in a game with him. The opportunity presented itself the other evening when Mr. Reynolds happened to be in the city. They played 27 games in George Sturdevant's restaurant and the Syracusan took every game. Still "Dick" is called a pretty good player.

At Riverside Park this evening four of the horse stalls in the lower part of the fair grounds were burned, the loss being about $200. The stalls are insured. They were probably fired by a tramp. The new combination hose and chemical was taken up to the park and it extinguished the fire in short order. But for it the whole row of stalls would undoubtedly have burned. This was the first time that the new combination was "officially" tried, and it worked satisfactorily.

Anna Blackwell, aged 52, died in this city at 7 a. m. to-day from a complication of diseases. The remains were taken to Utica, where she formerly resided, for interment.

Mr. and Mrs. Pesquali Verrichio, 421 West Willett street, mourn the loss of their six-months-old son, who died today.

An important telegram is at the Western Union office addressed to J. F. Hoffer, but he cannot be located.

To-night the boys let themselves loose and tipped over the benches in the parks, which by the way should have been placed away for the winter before this. They also dumped ash barrels, moved gates and about everything else that could be moved.

The Ladies' Aid Society of St. Joseph's church, will attend high celebration of Holy Eucharist on Wednesday morning as a memorial to Mrs. Roland Pritchard, whose death recently occurred. On Thursday (All Saints' Day) there will be a low celebration of the Holy Eucharis, in the chapel of the church at 8 p. m.

Mayor Charles Nickel, who was murdered at Chenoa, Ill., on Saturday, was a nephew of Mrs. Julius Smith of 509 West Court street, this city.

John C. Sass, hat manufacturer at 132 North Washington street, has installed a new hydraulic hat press, a section of which, under heavy pressure, burst yesterday and the coupling flew upward, striking Mr. Sass on the lower left jaw, making a compound fracture.

The police to-day took in custody a boy named Eric Wentworth, aged 17, of New Hartford, son of Mrs. Nellie Wentworth, who telephoned to the police that her son had run away and taken $3 belonging to her. The boy was found at the trolley station by Officer Dowling. He had $2.46 left. The mother was notified and came after the boy this evening. He said he was going up near Oneida to work in the chair factory.

Announcement is just made of the marriage of Horace S. Putnam and Anna L. Reider, both of Rome, which took place September 18 at Oriskany, the ceremony being performed by Rev. R. D. Davies. They have taken up their residence at 131 North Washington street.

Miss Florence Elwood, a private elocution teacher of this city, is drilling Mrs. L. J. Morgan's class of the First M. E. Sunday school, who will give a rhetorical entertainment in the chapel of the church on November 10.

Leming S. Wilson, Stuart Cross, John Jackson, M. Bracklin wrote their names and addresses on a piece of paper which they placed in a bottle which they threw in the Mohawk river from the bridge at Ridge Mills on August 13. To-day Wilson received a card from Allen Dieffendorf of Canajoharie, stating that he found the bottle near the bank of the river in that place.

Rev. Robert Scott of Buffalo, who has been given a call to preach in the Baptist church of this city, will meet the trustees in the church here on Friday afternoon. It is thought he will accept the call.

Mr. H. C. Sutton is very ill of acute Bright's disease at his home in East Park.

Mr. and Mrs. Evan J. Edwards have returned from their wedding trip.

Merritt Andrews, aged 82, of 409 North James street, has gone to Elmira to make an extended visit with his daughter, Mrs. John Bartholomew.

The Be Bee Club held an enjoyable dancing party to-night in Seegar's Dancing Academy and it was largely attended, this being the second of a series of dances to be given during the season by this popular social club. Guests were present from Utica, Syracuse and other places. Music was furnished by Yordon's Elite Orchestra.

The Rome Retail Milk Dealers' Association will to-morrow raise the price of milk to 6 cents a quart. Four quarts or less, 6 cents; five to fifteen quarts, 5 cents, and fifteen quarts or more, 4 cents.

The American Mechanics will serve an oyster supper in their rooms to-morrow evening.

Mrs. William Parsons of Chicago, who has been abroad the past season, and who has been visiting her sister, Mrs. N. C. Scudder, left this evening for her home.

A very interesting musical and literary entertainment will be held at Canterbury Hill Chapel on Thursday evening of this week. In addition to the orchestral numbers and recitations by Miss Bielby there will be two selections by Miss Jean V. Kirtland, instructor of elocution in the Rome Free Academy. After the programme supper will be served. All are invited.

A Great Business.

The largest Cloak and Suit business in the trade history of our city is now being done at The Busiest Dry Goods Establishment in Utica.

'BE SOBER'

Says President Roosevelt

"It is of incalculable consequence to the man himself that he should be sober and temperate, and it is of even more consequence to his wife and his children; for it is a hard and cruel fact that in this life of ours the sins of the man are often visited most heavily upon those whose welfare should be his one special care."—President Roosevelt to the Miners at Wilkesbarre, Pa.

Things to Remember When You Buy a Stove or Range.

There are many things to think of in buying a stove. If it is a heater, it must give out plenty of heat without waste; it must be durable, handsome, easy to manage, and the price must be right.

In our Oak Andes we have just such a stove. There is a steel drum and firepot, wood and coal grates of the most approved form of construction. Oak Andes have better joints and fittings than ordinary stoves, and are guaranteed to keep fire any length of time with greatest economy. Dampers are ground in emery, making them airtight, while all joints are perfectly bedded in asbestos cement. The quality of the Oak Andes, as well as its handsome exterior, will commend it to all prospective buyers, who desire stove service.

If you are contemplating the purchase of a range, the qualities necessary are much the same as in the purchase of a heater. The range must be economical to use, have good baking qualities, and should be made to last. The Grand Andes Range will fill every need of the housewife in every particular. They have been improved from year to year until they include all the best devices known to stove builders. These grand ranges have the most perfect form of fire box, two styles of grates, with ash pan of unusual capacity. The flues are perfectly proportioned and carry the heat in proper amounts to the oven, while insuring the right amount of draft to cause good combustion. The dampers are an improvement on any heretofore made. The ovens are perfect in form, provided with oven indicators which show the exact amount of heat and make bake day a pleasure.

Grand Andes Ranges burn either coal, wood or gas. They are extremely handsome in appearance, easy to use, and made to last a lifetime. Your dealer will be glad to show them to you and explain new improvements, many of them not being found in other stoves. Phillips & Clark Stove Co., Geneva, N. Y. For sale by

GRATEFUL TO CUTICURA

SUFFERED FOR MONTHS

"I wish you would publish this letter so that others suffering as I have may be helped. For months awful sores covered my face and neck, scabs forming, itching terribly day and night, breaking open, and running blood and matter. I had tried many remedies, but was growing worse, when I started with Cuticura. The first application gave me instant relief, and when I had used two cakes of Cuticura Soap and three boxes of Cuticura Ointment, I was completely cured. (signed) Miss Nellie Vander Wiele, Lakeside, N.Y."
